Photos, its Flickr photo sharing service, on July 19, 2012. The company says that it has built "a platform that enables a consumer's primary point of sharing on the web" and that the "technology has proven to be a highly effective platform for sharing photos." "The discontinuation of Yahoo! Photos will provide us with the flexibility to invest in other areas of the company." Flickr has a lot of traffic and is used by people to share photos, news and information. This announcement is unfortunate news for the company. Yahoo will be phasing out the Yahoo! Photos site by discontinuing the service in mid-July. The site will still be available until then, but new uploads will stop and existing uploads will be made available through the month. In the future, existing Yahoo! Photos subscribers will receive two years of support and will have the option to purchase a new subscription. A commenter at a Computerworld article mentioned: "Other than Yahoo! looking to squeeze a few more pennies out of the Flickr garbage, there is no way that Yahoo! would discontinue Flickr. Flickr is a great resource for Yahoo! to display to its users for the possible launch of Yahoo! Social Network, Yahoo! Weblogs." It was not clear to me why they would discontinue Yahoo! Photos. The company has been opening Yahoo! Photos up to brands to take photos of their products and display them on the Flickr service.The First United Methodist Church of Fort Worth is laying the groundwork to raise $1.6 million for an educational campus for AIDS and other services. Community Health Services' executive director, Steve Armentrout, will visit the Fort Worth church Sunday to introduce the plan for a campus building, the church's first building in years, according to the Rev.
